

End Time

A sequence of poems by
Rik Roots

Copyright © Richard James Roots 2025

First published in the United Kingdom and worldwide in 2025
by Rik's Sparky Little Printing Press

This chapbook forms part of the RikVerse.

The RikVerse is a living archive, updated regularly and available for viewing online at <https://rikverse2020.rikweb.org.uk/>

Document version: 1.0 (July 2025)

Dedicated to the people who wonder:
what happens after?

Table of Contents

Streetlamp Theatre

» Maggie stands tall tonight.

The Digger

» I was on the losing end of three hands

Post-murder

» I adore this stinking town. So many ways

Case Work

» Like all happy things, my commissions come in threes

The Case of the Man who was Dead

» Come, she says. I'll show you

Nocturne

» Know this: it was the death of sunlight and sky

The Job

» Nine strikes chime the length of the hall

Joan

» She hides herself in curtains. There's a ruck

Second Sin

» He brings a harsh heat into the room

The Seer

» Beyond the dock, a shamble of shacks

Intel

» Guns do not rattle. They punch through bones

The Momentary Meanings of Hugh

» He knows the mirror lies

From the Ass's Jaw

» Do you believe in destiny?

Crime of Passion

» He is a cold witness, as chill

The Fire and the Ice

» Some nights I daydream of a life beyond the City

Joe

» Joe is invisible today. He's lowered

Legend

» He says: I was not the first superhero

In Deo Speramis

» They say it takes a thief to catch a diamond

Case Notes

» The trouble with sobriety is the tendency to think clearly

The Warrior

» There is no chill to the mists that lap

In the Airless Night

» A man asked me today: did you ever

Death of a Poem

» They dragged it from its rank cell tied to a bookshelf bier

Streetlamp Theatre

Maggie stands tall tonight.
She has nails for heels
and cloth around her hips damp from the low cloud.

Cars slow, stop, inquire – she ignores their chrome charm.
Maggie stands tall tonight.

Lads drunk on new tattoos offer tatter-notes for favours.
She has nails for heels

and sees no reason to upgrade – she shuts away the pretty faces, keeps cloth around her hips.

And when the face she needs arrives, wallet on chain
damp from the low cloud

she takes chrome from her purse and fucks his chest with bullets.
Maggie stands tall tonight.

The Digger

I was on the losing end of three hands of duff cards; each round a waste of good cash after better. The line of table chatter was stacking words towards my exit: the struts of a door and my shadow through it, walking away.

Perhaps the cut of my suit scared away some guardian angels. The deft hands that re-fizz my gin are yours, door keepers for happier places. We waste a glance between us, eye-white words feeding each other the pickup line.

You breathe in my ear: "I can line you up with something stronger, away from the tables, yes?" Easy words to your blood-wine lips, easy like hands in a pocket tapping on change. I waste no time, ditch the game. The door mule-kicks back at my push; your door swivels easy on its hinge. A tight line of lights marks the shore – we waste a moment to draw in salt air. Then away to a different land, jungle hot: hands meshed as tight as mosquito nets; words possum-still as if hunted by jaguar; words hurled from stormy lungs. When the door clicks open, again, when strange hands grab at my limbs, when a hemp line tightens at my neck I am already away – lost within some wormwood waste.

"Who are you?" Your probe is a waste of our time: who am I? A set of words, nothing more; a gambler, a drunk away from his righteous wagon, a door pusher, a grifter quick with a line;
a man who sees futures in many hands.

A rustle of hands picking through your waste;
a click on your phone line – who hears your words?
I'll knock on your door and take you away ...

Post-murder

I adore this stinking town. So many ways to die. Tonight a lady shot her pimp.

"Didn't love me hard enough," she husked when asked by a flashbulb jockey: ...why?

There's beauty in trash: those shadows of what was can snatch an ache of stories from an un-holstered head. «Didn't love me!»

Her pimp is rich in coins; they clink and skit across planks, sketch hearts in bloody lines as he eases though my door, chest agape – another type of love, he groans. Dead bills flap as the corpse puddles to my desk: "Let's chat."

We sit across split pine in a cracked room in a city stacked at the end of time like party garbage.
"You're dead," I tell him. "Your case is closed."

The man has sapphires for teeth. From the hole in his chest he lifts his heart, its meat stopped:
"She broke this; she breaks it still. I need you to find her, save her, keep her heart whole."

Case Work

Like all happy things, my commissions come in threes. Who am I to complain? The first, the pimp, pays in stones from his jaw. They are good stones, not glass; if I knew a straight pawnbroker I could pay some rent – but hey?

"You should settle your liquor bill first," says Anj, she of the dark eyes and the darker lusts. I should pay her first – I can read the woman like a ripped-off pulp – but I need her to ask, beg me for back wages. Angels have to learn about tempers before they lose them, and my guardian ain't too quick to pick up the particulars of human failures. That lady's fallen, for sure, but not far enough. Not yet.

If this were a story Anj would sit outside my office door, keen to insult all who pass her mouth, her cusses reminding the world of the sins of small-time capitalists living the dream of private investigations. My place would be behind a desk piled with half-abandoned cases of men who cheat their girls swirled on the romance of roses and vows. Maybe a missing dog to track down to the pound to keep me in loose change. There would be a bottle of rye in my bottom draw. There would be a lost partner whose space opposite me could bleach my bones in pities and guilts. There would be a girlfriend tucked away somewhere, or an ex-girlfriend or – let's be honest here – a bum chum of the 'close companion' type to keep a flame for my lost morals.

Fuck that for a set-up.

The liquor ain't negotiable. Hey! It's the End Times – the news-sheets say it daily so it's gotta be true – and I lost my trick pelvis a while back; if you can't kiss your ass goodbye you might as well wrap your lips around something useful!

My second commission's a lost cat. Now there's a story to tell ...

The Case of the Man Who was Dead

Friday

"Come," she says. "I'll show you second hand" and takes her palms to her brow and pulls them wide:
walls crack to ooze a Levant light around us, swirl us – here.

This hill has strange trees.
"Only three, today," she smiles,
"I've watched them plant forests some mornings." A spring orchid spires amid cups of blue bindweed.

I see shapes in the guttering sun, watching, long shadows restored.
*"We could not go to him; we bore witness instead, a child of whispers:
what monsters and martyrs we birthed!"*

Almond petals spot the dry dirt white about our feet. From the vale wafts a sharp citrus; from the city call the chisel taps of hasty repair.
"Lost!" she murmurs. "I cannot move!"

Saturday

"How did you torment him?" I demand.

His face is huge: an ice-wall chin calving berg-hair; each cheek a flat tundra, fell-field pockets grey in the chill – his eye-caves could house nations.

And as he smiles, I follow his mechanics – oil and shape, twist and form, evolve a frosted fret of recollections tight across his blue lip. "You should ask the one who supplied my design, perhaps?"

He talks in gusts of air released from glaciers – a slow whisper of gas recalling the histories of the world.
"I charted the story of his message and watched him scream, scream. Scream!"

Sunday

*"Know this: he was a changed man when he first returned – more solid than the walls he walked through;
his words boiled love in my heart.
He wore his wounds like totems."*

She's changed, too. No longer the little woman – scarf-bound, lip-taut seeker, lost. She hunts like she hires: with crisp bills on wood she measures my worth.

These are good notes. I measure my questions accordingly: who and where, and how. Not why – the curves of her black-sheen calves suppress my need to know.

There's no noise outside, no wind to swirl the street litter in dance, no midnight trade, no dogs. "He's late," she tells me. "The world can't sing out its rattle-tunes if he won't come home."

Nocturne

Know this: it was the death of sunlight and sky that drew me to this fresh rye distill. Copper clouds drew reasons to thoughts, and muscles don't obey my orders in such moods. I've been gripping the neck for a long while now, watching stars flick between heavens.

I wish for rain: can you smell the drops? They reek of cool transactions and the promise of ice in tumblers.

Each sputter appears like a revelation on the pane that separates the beyond from here. Dark they are, a spit of harsh muse laughing at the hope of bottled comforts, thoughtlessly sipped. The first drop was bronzed jaundice, I remember now, a prismatic gathering of this bastard city's urgent towers and spires into a single daylit farewell.

Can you see the drop on the pane sag? There's enough gathered now to rivulet a course through dirt. They witness me as I watch them stipple a braille poem across glass. The only word I can read is: fool!

Anj ain't got no time for drunks, not tonight. Before she leaves our heap of space that pretends to be our office, her blouse two sizes too tight and her skirt a pencil of innuendoes, she clears my garbage of empties – ten cents on returns. She slaps my cheeks for luck and marks my brow with a kiss.

Such a night lensed in the rain. I wish I could walk through the fresh chill of washed air, my sniper's guile wrapping mysteries around my flesh. I wish – I wish I could stand...

The Job

Nine strikes chime the length of the hall.
She steeples her ears, extends a length of claw and, in good time, yawns – the reach of jaw wide and sharp and languid. A slit of jade checks for scurries in shadows; a slow swish in the webs that cove the room's ceiling speaks of open windows. She levers limbs from the curl and, four paws to the point, arches, tail tall: shiver; still. The fluff of dreams flicks from her lobes, and a lick of spit primes whiskers for work. All edges in her domain shall be checked, all scents renewed by cheek and chin and scratch – a duty as old and deep as an Egyptian nap.

Joan

She hides herself in curtains. There's a ruck of demons trapped in fractured air; they slick at her skin. She keeps her charms close and ticks her thumb on each: a shell; a feather plucked from a crow, dead in the street's gutter. Why does Hell hide in the eyes of strangers? When did Satan settle on Joan's soul? But then she knows there's evil everywhere: the sigh of doors; a light-switch click; the quiet hymn of unseen codes that cut across the cloud and slit her hopes, her thoughts – she grips her shroud of curtains, summons fibs and pseudonyms and prays to silent saints that don't exist to stop the skirl of pulsing words ...

Second Sin

He brings a harsh heat into the room;
stones among sand: "You see me?"

I nod, reach for the warm whisky as he hunches down on the chair with the snapped back, almond mouth bitter within its shallow beard.

He says: *"I need a vengeance. My grave has room for another, a brother to lie in his furrow by my bones.
I can pay you in camels, or goats."*

The sun in my dull mirror, it hangs off the broken window, bloods clouds, marks a fall. From the street, a shout;
a coil of flamed headline; the bark of a car. "Am I your brother's seeker?"

"These are good camels," he smiles,
"keen in the snout for water."

The Seer

Beyond the dock, a shamble of shacks crates a life's worth of stories beneath their slow-cooling corrugations. My path does not belong here, though my feet disagree: I have a question that no measure of bourbon will answer. This one tells fortunes, she says. Her back steeps higher than her head; the sticks in her hands speak of richer work long lost like a cool morning breeze.

"This is not your first turn on the Wheel, child. Many times you've climbed, slimed, from a woman's womb - and still you search." I yearn for a tall tumbler, ice promised in alcohol to hold my mind to her words: "You know what I seek?"

She murmurs coercions and mentions coin – a dime for bread and insights. Already the sun cancers the clouds in blood and the nights in these alleys care only for drunks. "They say the end of time has come," I tell her. She shakes her head against her shrunk chest: "True, true. None shall be born again, thank God!"

Intel

Guns do not rattle. They punch through bones to jack a shoulder back, a wrestler keen to wrench joints apart, then whisper: I have made you God.

He says to me: "Happy is He who repays you for what you have done to us; He who gathers up your infants and dashes them against the rocks."

I have no gun, nor son, nor daughter to place upon this city's pyres. All I have is a ragged prophet, a fist around an empty bottle, and some dry eyes.

My questions are not bullets to shatter facts from faces. I let the air escaping my tongue wash the dirt from the old man's despair: where and when, and who told you this, and that, and 'I have another jar of the good juice for a guy who has the know of passing whispers to his friends.'

He jerks his chicken-thin neck like a jailbird dodging the noose: "Yes, oh yes; the words of a whisperer are like dainty morsels. I can set that table for you."

The Momentary Meanings of Hugh

He knows the mirror lies.

It lied when he was six, refused to catch the ghosts

who whispered at his ear within its dull blue frame.

It lied when he was ten, aching long whiles to draw the bruises on his face he'd earned in playground brawls.

Wrap it. Bag it. Box it?

Move it. Shift it out and gone!

It lied last night. It placed the tears across her cheek

when there were none. Her smile did not translate. He knows this mirror lies: it shows a stranger's life at him;

it curses him, this plane
of guilt and long regard.

Smash it ...? No. Ten thousand lies still lie!

He knows the mirror must lie.

From the Ass's Jaw

"Do you believe in destiny?"

He's old, this one, blind as he walks in the steps of a child. His breath smells sweet, brandy in flame; his lungs buzz. I shake my head –

"We are what we do, no more."

He laughs. "A harsh judgement you place on my back; I have killed many men. A child of the sun can do no more than follow the knots embraided in his hair."

"I have no comb to change you!"

He knocks bills from the desk as he leans to my face: I see midnight enthroned in sockets.

"I chose to push the pillars," he says, "cascade that stony sky –

"I am a good judge. Are you?"

Crime of Passion

He is a cold witness, as chill
as a slip of rime on the lip of a crisp new beer. For weeks

I chased his rumour, sharp alleys un-vexed by daylight, garbage mansions bearding freeway struts.

This shade sits easy in my office, his lids half-cupped as eyes check evidence stacks for entertainments.

"The whisper is you want some words."

My list of questions is as long as the walk to the liquor store, but the one I choose is short: why?

"Who asks?" As he tilts his head to scratch his beard I spot hemp-weave patterns scorched deep in his neck.

My stare flicks to the desk where lies a Gideons, liberated from its hotel drawer by the woman who hired me.

"I choked, and yet I breathe again."

His smile is quick and sad, a crack of tooth between louse-lush fuzz ruddied by the slant guttering of the sun.

I tell him of visions. I tell him that night follows day and histories walk the city's baked streets.

"He told me to do it." he says.

"Anyone can get their hands and heels nailed to some planks of wood!"

His face whips close: I catch rust webs of bust veins etched on eye-whites – his lung-dust stills my tongue.

"I loved him! I kissed him and when our lips touched my name was seared to the heart of every man alive

*"and every child whelped after. I sense my style beats within your chest
... you cannot afford my dogma!"*

The Fire and the Ice

Some nights I daydream of a life beyond the City. I have memories, a few of them true – or as honest as a half-sober mind can make them. There was a time before the End Times, know.

They remind me of paintings, those dreams, a cracked cere smeared over smiles and snarls. Has a painter ever captured the cramp of an empty belly? I asked Anj, once. She shrugged me an answer – it was one of those days she was done talking to me: a good day, that one, which ended in a settled bill from a grateful wife with a vindiction to complete.

Beyond the City the land is a crack of dirt and skeletons steeped in a drought of lost promises. Those who were once there lived amid the gaze of a harsh sun in the pomp of its endless summer; too hot to sleep, us kids would daze our way from shade to twilight, one missed hop-skip-step from clinker melanomas.

Yeah ... good times.

"You gonna finish the Lady's case? She's paid an advance." Anj has ice in her water; the chips rattle in the tumbler like ten dollar tokens on the bones table. "It's religious," I say. She smirks: "The dame must be desperate to bring it to you."

What can I do, but agree?

All of the world is this City, now. Every love's sigh a breeze through detritus, every tear a salt slick in another shot of tequila. Our City is a place where diamonds are cheaper than a slice of lime, where wine skims through sump oil and the best place to find ice is in the chest of a dead CEO.

"I love this City," I tell Anj. She smiles, teases my brow with a wipe of cold glass as she reaches into my pocket to liberate her wage.

Joe

Joe is invisible, again. He's lowered his hood to set his face free, let breathe the scabs and growths in his bones that dapple his jaw, his brow, his smile.

Joe knows he's invisible: the reflex lack of eyes that look back – tell; the turn of necks to shop displays – confirm:
the street is his toy to play with now.

As Joe takes steps, his majestic shadow flutters ahead, clearing crowds so he can see the artful measures taken to distill desires to needs: firestorm sales to end all sales.

Look at what offers have been set to tempt the coins in his pocket! For Joe has a stench of many pockets, which he is eager to empty and fill – though suited clerks can't spot Joe beyond the tattooed knuckles holding coins, ready to spin coppers across counters. Still, a wealthy hand of uncaught thefts is as good as a face that fits, for a man who cannot be seen.

Legend

He says: *"I was not the first superhero
to stride lightquick from mountain to town:
sit close, seeker, and let us share words worthy of curses and judgements."*

Gossip has drawn me to his artless nest of chromed rusts set deep in this cleft between skyscraped walls. Bee swarms tress from his scalp - a strength of sorts.

"You should strangle angels with gifts," he tells me. *"What mother would deny her own son the solace of wine, or beer?
I never sought power; yet I am here."*

Some call him Riddler; others whisper of slaughters and bloodlusts. I have a gun by my heart, its womb taut with bullets; brass cases line the jaw of his ass.

"That one you seek – he is lost and found and lost again. Angels raped his mother, you know? He read his eulogies, screamed blood from his eyes. I was a judge, once,

*"and rendered temples to their foundations;
you do not want to help that man. Salvation is a fool's gamble, a fixed deal. I tell you now:
stars will shatter when he sets down his verdict."*

In Deo Speramus

They say it takes a thief to catch a diamond:
the stone I seek should spark like resurrections – but not in this city of parvenu panhandlers, too busy skimming the cream of solid work to sniff the sewer they sit in. A long walk later I find my thief stood in a tap room with ant-addled stools:

"Can't abide the scrub of them splinters on my arse, if you can savvy me." I oil him in gin to part his lips:
"You know where he is?" He has a slow, long smile and a longer nod – "I sees him around. He peeps through them holes in his hands, that one, not keen to hold to his promises. But I knows him well, his smells and shakes. I shares his fame like we shared that hill for a time – he's quiet, mind: worries his head for our world; he won't scream no more for this dead making."

Case Notes

The trouble with sobriety is the tendency to think clearly – I mean: who needs that shit? This bastard city makes more sense when my edges are smoothed.

Take this canal. Last night it was a stretch of shoddy water along which I could amble and sit and roll up into its bank for a few moment's peace. But now I'm awake and clean with the shakes all it offers is a bunch of recollections: friends and fathers and Happy Times and a headache from Hades itself.

Did I really go visit Hell? That giant was cold, man! A face of eternal ice chips begging for a hot bourbon ocean to melt in.

I don't know what's real no more. I made notes; they're in my pocket somewhere. Don't need no beermat scribbles to know I've gone crazy – dead pimps don't walk into my office and show me their fucking hearts! Anj would've mentioned the mess, bless here flint-sharp soul!

I have a thirst that could drink buckets from this canal. Even after I've pissed in it.

This man the Lady wants me to find is everywhere and nowhere. Look in a shattered window, a garbage-fed flame – the chrome sheen of a gun's barrel – he's there, waving back. Taunting me: catch me if you can, old man!

Who is he? All the revenants know him. One fucker kissed him and another died with him on a hill. I could die right here: the way my temples throb they might as well house a couple of friendly-fire slugs. And when I find him – what then? It's the End Time, baby! Settle my businesses; pay poor Anj the last of the wages I owe her. Curl my head to my thighs and kiss my lame cock goodbye!

And then what – this whisper of a man gets to judge me? Whatever.
I've been judged by two myths already: the third'll be the fucking charm.

I'm gonna find him, today. I know this in my churned guts. I already have my defence planned: Please Have Mercy, Your Immanent Honour, For I Do Like Cats.

The Warrior

There is no chill to the mists that lap between the bars of this cage. The man I seek sits on the gate's step, his neck chained in the bones and nails of thumbs and toes. His teeth are flint, his torso a marble of sweat and soot and vein.

"Are you here to beg, or fight? I see you can count to ten: an unholy edge in this game."

Beyond the steel arena litter pits flicker with new-sprouted flame; shadows of a crowd clot in huddles, their murmurs a purr of anticipations. A drum of moonshine fountains when a pick bites its purloined lid.
I ask about heroes with holes in their hands.

"He brawls like a wildfire, that one. His haul of sliced trophies near matches my own."

The cage is small, six paces to a side and barely a hop to grasp the bars that span its roof. The floor is a mud of blood; I can read screams in the slide of foot-stamps. Hair mats the gate's hinges.
An eye has spat its cataract onto the lock.

*"The rabble here, they love his lethal dismay;
I have his number, if you have the moves."*

In the Airless Night

A man asked me today: did you ever love him? And I had to, to think ...

Perhaps when I was young and clever I found space in my heart for one whose stories echoed through decades – a hero of sorts, a brother who came here to an earth ripe with promise and penance. Tales he gave us, ways made fit for those who despaired of fitting their wrecked lives to some norm beyond the reach of their kibbled coins. A holy, deserving man of the lord come to deliver riches and solace: loving each other the key to joy – did I ever love him? Where others saw angels I saw a book full of old words and angels were harsh fairies with trumpets and wings too big for their, their frocks ...

They nailed him hard to wood, poor bastard, then bowed to his tattered meat – if that is love, then no: I refuse to worship a butchered corpse, the ghost it hatched or any lie his, his acolytes created ...

Some people say he lives again,
that this is the promised time of raptures:
ungather us from evil men indeed! Yet others whisper: he rages and sobs and screams at what we've done, become in his name. Seek out this spirit fleshed again against his will and stop him before he shatters the heavens and peels the clouds to cleanse the world in lightning and ice. People are hatreds – now there is a love I understand, for sin is my heart, my joy and my comfort, my wealth and hearth, solace and, and lust ...

To the man who spoke to me this morning:
I'm sure when we meet, our love shall burn!

Death of a Poem

They dragged it from its rank cell tied to a bookshelf bier, its bondage spun from old glue-spattered twine. It tried to lay flat in its frame, but the morning was dank with low cloud; jeers flapped at its long-ago turned corner, lifting it as if a salute. The plank was heavy: it parted each puddle in a wake to shod onlookers in mud. They responded with hawked spits and rancid fruits – a tatter-tape celebration of its forthcoming demise.

Slow was that journey, yet quickly done. Its i's widened as the wood to which it was tied stood on its end, and flew.

Above the crowds, space. Across the platform it could see the tortures of its demise: string; board; crayon and scissors. Declamations were made, but it didn't listen. It worried about its last words, though it knew its last words already – a good couplet, rhymed, with a brief epiphany signalled in syllables. Words and shape were its entirety: what else could there be?

First the hanging, pegged by its bottom margin to a washing line and pulled up, and up to where the wind could ripple its papery flesh. One of its words was 'flag', it realised. Now it was a flag, white with fright, alone since that day it had been ripped from the loving leaves of its tribe and taken to the hall of hollow echoes, for judgement. Another of its words was 'map': the map is not the thing, it knew, yet now it was.

Only after a severe gust tore into its flat weave was it lowered. A hand reached up and plucked it roughly from the pegs, leaving its beloved page number – eighty four – stranded in air. No time to hurl vowels to the sky. The hand screwed it to crushes before patting it flat on the board and applying brass tacks to keep it pinioned. Which colour would they use? it found itself wondering, again. An ink of classroom green was its worst fear, an analytical dissection of its form and function in front of bored kids only there for the attendance mark. It almost sighed when the fat red crayon pushed into its title to be dragged from corner to corner, bent corner to missing corner – the very X of communication.

The last act – the final torture whose mere fact had wormed through its fibres during the nightmare hours - was a relief when it came. This executioner was called Stanley, according to the brand stamped into its hash-grip handle. A fine blade, honed to peak perfection – the cuts that gutted lines to words, words to letters, were a lover's caress, a mother's soft stroke.

In the crowd below, a girl in tears recites its verse from memory. It doesn't matter. Today is a day for petals and confetti: released, it can litter the world.